The Rare Is Over

Thank God. The Republican Party now has a candidate who will whack Barrack Hussein into oblivion, get our country moving anew in the right direction, and eliminate this crazy seesaw we've been riding since our 911 tragedies.

Most executive positions in the real world are filled with people who bring with them a resume containing experience garnered as they climbed the experience ladder which prepared them to head one rung higher. A nation that elected as President a man with absolutely nothing in his resume that would indicate he was ready for the position of chief executive officer of the United States of America is now paying its due.

The key trick to being a successful chief executive is the ability to select a team that is capable of enabling the leader to carry out his responsibilities to the max. If the guy on top is inexperienced, there is a high probability he will select the wrong team, carry out the wrong programs, and fail to lead the nation in the right direction. Which is exactly where we are. On top of all this, add a non-American sensibility to our national long standing clerical tenets, traditions, and values and it becomes clear that the USA has been derailed and is being driven in the wrong direction.

And now comes forth an aspiring candidate with a resume like few others. Herman Cain started at rock bottom, built a solid academic career (with a Masters from my alma mater), then began to climb the success ladder until he reached the pinnacle in three basic industries: business management, banking and information systems. This plus being an accomplished public speaker and author, provide a solid foundation for the new position he will occupy next November when elected President of the USA.
